

Park Habitats

Three major habitats are found at Writing-on-Stone: the upland prairie; the hoodoo/cliff; and the riverside or riparian habitats. Each habitat provides breeding and nesting sites for different species of birds. As you are bird-watching, you will notice that distinct groups of birds are found in each of these environments. This list includes information on the usual breeding habitat of resident birds.

Home on the Range

Writing-on-Stone is home to a number of significant bird species. Some birds, such as the Rufous-sided Towhee and Rock Wren, are scarce in Alberta, but common in the Park. Yellow-breasted Chats and Black-headed Grosbeaks are at the northern limit of their range. The Ferruginous hawk, one of Canada's threatened species, is also occasionally seen at Writing-on-Stone.

Protected Habitats

By protecting important bird habitats, the significance of Writing-on-Stone goes beyond a long list of birds. The hoodoos and cliffs found in the Archaeological Preserve provide critical undisturbed nesting areas for birds of prey. The riparian habitat, where many of the Park's birds nest and feed, is now a threatened environment on the prairies. The upland prairie of the Park is home to many birds typical of the grasslands, but this habitat is also disappearing fast. We must ensure that these habitats, both in the Park and throughout the prairies, continue to be protected in the future.
